JMU MARCHING ROYAL DUKES

The James Madison University Marching Royal Dukes are entering their 12th year as an exciting part of the fall football season. Since its inception, the band has entertained halftime audiences at all JMU home games, as well as selected away games each season. In addition, the band had been featured at several pro games, including last year's NFC Divisional playoffs, and as the exhibition band at high school marching competitions.

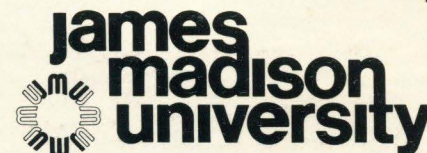

The marching band program at JMU was started in 1972 and has rapidly grown in size and quality. The members of the Royal Dukes represent every college and major at JMU. Over half of the members of the members of the JMU band are non-music majors.

The 1983 Royal Dukes are directed by Mr. Pat Rooney. This year's band is proud to continue the reputation of professional, enthusiastic performances representing the best of the student body at James Madison. We can say with pride, "Ladies & Gentlemen, Virginia's finest, the James Madison University Marching Royal Dukes."

The James Madison University Department of Music, a full member of the National Association of Schools of Music, has long served a variety of purposes within the university. In addition to offering undergraduate and graduate major programs, the department serves as a cultural adjunct to a well-rounded university education by providing students with opportunities for personal enrichment. Music, one of three departments in the School of Fine Arts and Communication, enrolls between 325-400 majors annually and seeks to prepare students for productive lives as professional musicians and teachers. Although the music program is designed to nurture in students a devotion to the highest standards of their art, traditional and non-traditional tracks of study contain some flexibility so that students may explore various alternatives and increase their employment marketability.
